Alaska's school truancy rates are calculated by dividing the total number of truant students (unduplicated students accumulating 5 or more days of unexcused absence in the school year) by the school's count of student membership, and then multiplying this number by 100. This 2010-2011 Alaska truancy report has been generated utilizing the truancy data from EED's online Suspensions, Expulsions, and Truancies (SET) data collection system. Districts reported all full days of unexcused absence for all K-12 students in all schools into SET, and EED used these data to calculate school truancy rates for all public schools. While the 2010-2011 school truancy rate report provides educational stakeholders with information on the degree to which Alaska's schools are experiencing truancy, its truancy calculations must be interpreted with caution. The following factors should be considered when viewing the report.

 DATA LIMITATIONS

- “Unexcused ” absence is currently defined locally. Significant variability in how unexcused is defined exists between districts (and sometimes even by schools within a district) and this impacts the data. For example, truancy rates from districts/schools that define full day absences from school taken for family vacations (with signed parental permission) as unexcused must be interpreted differently than data from districts/schools that defined these absences as excused. The SET data collection system does not capture these distinctions.
- Truancy rates are most accurately calculated when they include only those students for whom school attendance is compulsory. In Alaska, attendance is required for students between ages 7 and 16. The truancy rates in this report are calculated using the data for all students grades K-12 and therefore include students younger than 7 and older than 15.
- Some districts have communicated challenges in extracting full days of unexcused absence data from their school data management systems to submit to EED and have expressed concerns about data integrity.
- Several districts indicated their current policies and reporting procedures do not clearly separate excused from unexcused absences, resulting in under/over reporting in their truancy data submissions to EED.

Efforts to address the limitations above are currently underway at both the state and the local level, and it is anticipated the quality of the truancy data will continue to improve in subsequent reports.
